Ezcap Setup 32 Bit.Q: Method exception handling in Ruby While learning Ruby I found a solution to a problem, which looks counter intuitive to me. If we have the following simple method: def foo(a,b) # Do something c end The method is said to "handle exceptions" when the last line returns an error. The explanation given is as follows: Because the exception is raised by the last line of the method, it is said that that method handles the exception. I don't understand why. This method simply returns a value and doesn't even have a return statement inside it. So why does the method handle an exception? Does the return statement store the result of some calculations in a place that would make the method complain that we are trying to return a value when we actually are not? Is it the job of the caller of the method to handle any exception raised by it or it is simply the method's responsibility to "handle" the exception? A: The documentation for exceptions in Ruby specifies that: In order to catch exceptions, a method catches them by wrapping all its code in a begin...rescue block. In Ruby, exceptions are taken explicitly. This means that foo has the responsibility to handle that exception, as it is the method that declared that it would handle that exception. Some examples: foo(:not_a_hash, :a, {:b => :value}) # Block # foo(:not_a_hash, :a, {:b => :value}) rescue Exception => e # Exception: Exception foo(:not
