Let's skip the pretty interface. There is a theme setting preference -- color temperature, design choice, and template -- and then you are ready to go. The program is intuitive. When you are done with an image, you can press back to go to the next image in your video. While processing, you can view progress, and see individual edits made to the image. Be it a timeline, histogram, or an image window, all the details of an image are represented clearly, and easily viewed. And image responsiveness, that is not a concern. The program's speed is top notch. Simply opening an image, deciding what it needs, and applying those fixes is not an issue. Lightroom 5 is really something. The more complex edits, and more complex image transforms take more time, of course. I've witnessed images load in a couple of seconds, pick up the perfect retouch, and load out to a new filename. These are real-time, non-play state applications and take phenomenal performance. As a comparison, a few seconds in Photoshop CS6 is real-time. Again, I will not perform intricate editing. I can do some minor changes in brightness and contrast on an image, applying various camera presets, fixing red eye, white balance, and removing some of the fuzz around the edges. Lightroom 5 offers a number of new adjustment algorithms. The final section (i.e. the fourteenth) of this article deals with Lightroom 5 and the recently released Apple Pencil. You can peruse dozens of articles detailing the current state of Adobe's flagship photo editing software. I chose to put it at the end of this review to provide you with a quick cheat sheet of the latest features I have encountered since the update. The fact that Lightroom 5 was heavily influenced by the Apple Pencil, a peripheral that many reviewers do not consider a must for photographers, is an interesting bonus. In addition, I get to mention the pencil's ability to sync via iCloud, a feature I was unable to test during my review, and get a very nice benchmark to show you how fast your processor really is.
